Most of "Greater Boston" ^{was} is a long way from Boston

If you live or work in Greater Boston, it takes you as long to drive to Logan International Airport during commuter hours as to fly to New York. This arrangement doesn't make sense, and you may find that you can't spare the time and energy it takes. So fly to the airport. By helicopter, you're 12 minutes from Logan International on Route 128, 6 minutes in Cambridge. And Mass. Helicopter's fleet of swift, luxurious Bell Rangers now serves 15 suburban communities in Greater Boston. At Logan International, we're at Gate 18, conveniently in the center of the terminal building, and we make stops at over 36 public and industrial helistops. Flights are every half hour from Logan International and from major outlying helistops. We'll get you to the airport on time, and we'll get you back on time. The pilots are great. They average more than 3,300 hours in helicopters. If you've been up in a plane so many times that it's nothing more to you than a walk to the water cooler, get up in a helicopter. You're in a flying easy chair, surrounded by a wrap-around picture window. Look over the pilot's shoulder or stretch out and sight right over the tips of your toes. Beautiful. You'd think Boston was built just for people in helicopters. The price? About the same as a taxi. And helicopter hopping saves you as much as an hour and a half per trip for valuable productive work. If you're making a business trip, ask the boss how much your time and good disposition are worth. If you're the boss, ask your wife. You deserve tickets, and you may reserve tickets by calling our reservations desk anytime, day or night, so long as you call at least a half hour before flight. Or call any of the public helistops. For a business flight, speak to your company's travel manager.
